Obamacare: What does the law really do? A woman holds up a sign as she and others participate in a health care rally outside the U.S. Supreme Court on March 23, 2012. Photo by Kevin

When the Affordable Care Act was introduced, much was said about the idea that each state would opt-in or out of parts of the legislation. It was a pledge by President Barack Obama to the Supreme Court that no state would be forced to participate. A few years later, the Obama administration revised its statement to say that it would not penalize any state that decided to opt-out of its programs. The Supreme Court already had given its blessing to the federal government's "individual mandate" -- the requirement that most people buy health insurance or face a fine - - but there remained a big difference in the way the "individual mandate" applied in the 34 states with Republican governors and lawmakers compared with the 32 with Democratic governors. The opt-out states, at the time, included seven states where Republican governors refused to implement the federal law's Medicaid expansion, which gave a federal subsidy to states that agreed to participate. The seven Republican-led states instead opted out. Then-Solicitor General Donald Verrilli, who argued the case in the Supreme Court, told Congress on May 20, 2014, that the administration did not intend to punish states that opted out. Instead, he said, it only expected that the opt-outs states would not receive additional funds. But the states that decided not to participate were continuing to receive the same amount of funding under the law. So the Supreme Court decided to take the matter up, asking the administration to submit a new plan for the 2014-2015 funding year. In a brief filed May 13, 2014, the administration told the justices that even though it did not plan to fine the states for opting out, the administration did intend to cut off funding for Medicaid in opt-out states. The court then gave the states until June 27 to make a decision. After they did so, the administration could take its funding cut away in late August.

However, the court has ruled twice that the Constitution requires the federal government to reimburse states for the costs of Medicaid expansion. The federal government has asked the Supreme Court to delay its ruling on that case until the individual mandate case is decided. Several states have chosen to extend Medicaid to more people. But many governors and state officials have said that it is more than their states can afford.

The Medicaid expansion will affect 14 million people, says the Kaiser Family Foundation. That's the number of people who will
